Former Wathena resident Mark Shalz delivers vault for Reagan Funeral

Taken from the June 29, 2004 issue of the Franklin County (NE) Chronicle

When the millions of television viewers were watching the events that preceded the actual funeral and entombment following the death of President Ronald Reagan, June 5, 2004, only a select few knew of a problem that had arisen.

Funeral arrangements for the president had been made several years prior to his death, and it was not until after his death that it was discovered the mahogany casket that had been chosen was not going to fit the burial vault.

The funeral director in charge of the services was a friend of Joe Suhor, president and CEO of the Kansas City Wilbert Vault Co., who was at a convention with regional vice president of the Mushum operators Mark Shalz and they were contacted to see if an appropriate vault could be found. There was a suggestion that had been made was to place the casket with the former president’s body inside the tomb at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library in Simi Valley, CA without a vault. Mark thought that was not an appropriate burial for a president.

The search found an oversized vault in Marion, IA (outside of Cedar Rapids) Tuesday, June 8. “We had an idea where an oversized vault was located so it only took a couple of hours,” remarked Mark Shalz. The vault would be picked up in Iowa, taken back to Kansas City to be painted and then Mark would transport them in disbelief of the events and were sworn to secrecy on the ordeal. No one was to know of the event, with only a few employees at the Kansas City Wilbert Vault Co. knowing where the vault’s final destination would be. When making the trip to California Mark was told that if the vehicle broke down just to go buy a new vehicle, not to wait around for it to get fixed. Fortunately, it did not break down until the return trip home, where they exchanged vehicles at a branch of their company.

Unfortunately for Lester, executive vice-president and CFO Dennis Welzenbach decided he would be the person making the 25 hour drive to California with Mark. Lester would be sitting at home, watching the historical event on television, knowing his son would have a part of the famous entombment.

When Mr. Shalz and Mr. Welzenbach arrived in California with the vault, pallbearers were having a practice so everything would go smoothly.

Following the California sunset farewell service for the former president, Nancy Reagan left the premises at 10:45 p.m. When Mr. Shalz came around the corner he was taken aback as Reagan’s casket was before him with no one around to guard the casket. “I was very surprised that no one was guarding the casket,” remarked Shalz.

A catered meal for 700 had been planned following the ceremony. Shortly before 3:00 a.m., with the landscapers taking over their part of the operation. The only people at the library were a handful of Secret Service agents, library personnel, mortuary representatives and landscapers. Lights were placed around the area with the light shining away from the final resting place, to ensure that the press would get no pictures of what was going on at the time.

Mark commented, “This has to rate as one of the top five events in my life, with my two children being first. I had chills and there were tears in my eyes.”

As with any parent, both Lester and Marilee Shalz were extremely proud of Mark. “This is something that you wouldn’t expect a small town boy to do. The whole time we were watching on TV, we were wondering where Mark was,” remarked Marilee.
contacted to see if an appropriate vault could be found. If not, a suggestion that had been made was to place the casket with the former president’s body inside the tomb at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library in Simi Valley, CA, without a vault. Mark thought that was not an appropriate burial for a president.

The search found an oversized vault in Marion, IA (outside of Cedar Rapids) Tuesday, June 8. “We had an idea where an oversized vault was located so it only took a couple of hours,” remarked Mark Salz. The vault would be picked up in Iowa, taken back to Kansas City to be painted and then Mark would transport the vault to the west coast via pickup. Mark could take a relief driver of his choice along with him and Mark’s choice for his relief driver was going to be his father, Lester Salz of Franklin. He made the phone call to Franklin to speak to his mother, Marilyn and Lester, but television, knowing his son would have a part of the famous cornerstone.

When Mr. Salz and Mr. Welzenbach arrived in California with the vault, pallbearers were having a practice so everything would go smoothly. Following the California sun-set, farewell service for the former president, Nancy Reagan left the premises at 10:45 p.m. When Mr. Salz came around the corner he was taken aback as Reagan’s casket was before him with no one around to guard the casket. “I was so surprised that no one was guarding the casket,” remarked Salz.

A catered meal for 700 had been planned following the services, but everyone left, so members of the cemetery crew, vault company and landscaping crew were encouraged to eat the catered meal. Due to the length of the final farewell to the former president, they had formed an additional mahogany casket which required Mr. Salz and Mr. The remains of former President Ronald Reagan were entombed at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library in Simi Valley, CA. The chair to the right in the photo was used by Nancy Reagan at the final services. The casket pictured in the photo was a rehearsal casket.

Pictured are Mark Salz, regional vice president of the Missouri operations of Wilbert Vault Co., Joe Suhor, president and CEO and Dennis Welzenbach, executive vice president and CFO.

Two hearses were used in the service of former President Ronald Reagan. This hearse was the one that actually carried the body, with the other hearse at the end, in case of breakdowns. License plates were removed from all vehicles.
Flags, floral tributes and signs were placed at the presidential library in California paying tribute to the former President. —photos courtesy of Mark Shatz

Two hearses were used in the service of former President Ronald Reagan. This hearse was the one that actually carried the body, with the other hearse at the end, in case of breakdowns. License plates were removed from all vehicles.

Subscribe to
The Kansas Chief
Local: $22 per year (add 1.39 tax in Kansas)
$30 elsewhere

Name __________________________
Address ________________________
City, State & Zip __________________

Mail with your check to:
PO Box 369
Troy KS 66087
or call 785-985-2456